I have a java program and I'm trying to implement a log system. I think my solution is pretty hacky. I have a generic logger that takes in a filename and writes to a file. This works fine. To implement the logging I need to read the output of my application. I'm currently doing it like this: I've got a big config file that contains all the information I need. This file contains about ~1000 lines and each line is formatted like this: logfile.log,1300885579,XXX,null, The first number is a timestamp of when the line was written. The second number is the line number. The third field is the information I care about. The fourth field is null for every line. When the application runs I load the config file and then use the format above to write to a temporary file: File oldFile = new File("oldFile"); File newFile = new File("newFile"); FileChannel chan = new FileInputStream(oldFile).getChannel(); FileOutputStream out = new FileOutputStream(newFile); byte[] buf = new byte[4096]; int len; while ((len = chan.read(buf)) > 0) { out.write(buf, 0, len); } chan.close(); Then when my application is done it deletes the oldFile and then renames the newFile to the same name as oldFile. This is how I've been able to track changes to the application and so far it seems to work well. However, this has gotten a bit unwieldy when I want to implement a logging system. In my case I'm trying to write to
