More particularly, the invention relates to an electrochemical method for producing a carbon nanotube film of low thickness, which can be used in the fabrication of a biosensor, or an analytical device. Carbon nanotubes (CNTs) are elongated tubular fullerene structures, which have their origin in graphite. However, while graphite consists of flat, stacked two-dimensional sheets of carbon atoms, a graphite crystal can be likened to a gigantic, flat straw, with its ends curled up to form CNTs. A CNT consists of a cylindrical core, or carbon skeleton, with a diameter of approximately 0.3 nm to 1 nm, depending upon the method of production, and has a length of up to several microns. Multi-walled carbon nanotubes (MWCNTs) are CNTs, comprising a plurality of walls, which generally have diameters smaller than 10 nm. Bulk CNTs or bundles of CNTs (CNTs of one or more nanometer thickness) have gained interest as materials to be employed in a diverse range of materials, such as conductors, composite materials, water dispersible, electrochemical sensing, electronic materials, energy materials, lightweight structural materials, ion-conductive materials, and so forth. Reaction between the CNTs and a chemical reagent is generally employed to produce a CNT-based material or film. A CNT-based film is typically produced by a simple method that involves physically
