For a detailed list of AutoCAD program features and capabilities, refer to the AutoCAD Program Functions Guide. Program Function Summary AutoCAD Uses a graphics windowing environment to allow multiple users to access and manipulate a 3D model at the same time. Allows simultaneous editing and manipulation of multiple blocks of geometry simultaneously. Allows easy synchronization between your drawing and the work of others. Exports drawing data into Word, Excel, or PowerPoint files. Exports blocks as images to other programs. Exports blocks as 3D models and to 3D printing. Draws 2D architectural plans. Allows 2D plans to be exported to DWG/DXF files. Can also export plans to PDF files. Allows blocks to be embedded into other drawing files. Supports all block types including lines, arcs, circles, rectangles, polygons, splines, solids, and text. Supports dynamic block insertion, where a block is added to a drawing as it is created, and can be used as a boundary condition. Provides precise control over the placement of geometric components. Automatic creation and synchronization of block properties to aid in editing and maintaining properties as geometry is changed. Allows parts to be edited or deleted independently of the model as a whole. Supports intelligent placement of components at mid-dimension intersections. Supports creation of objects and lines, arc, circle, and polyline drawings. Allows creation of 2D and 3D drawing views. Supports interactive field creation and editing, which allows drawing field objects within the drawing window. Supports interactive information collection. Allows users to add additional geometry with an additional perspective, without rendering the entire model. Can perform construction tasks such as material collections, layer collections, and explicit cuts. Supports layer views to improve project organization and to make parts of a model easier to find. Allows model components to be selectively hidden. Provides interfaces to other applications including Acrobat Pro, PowerPoint, and Visio, for managing graphics. The problem is that on the first page load, when the user lands on the application, it tries to display the user's name. If the user is logged in with a different session, the login page should be shown. If the user is logged in with the same session, it should already show the name. So I need to get this information in a very quick and easy way. I looked at session variables but they will not work for us because there are multiple tenants. I also looked at cookies, but I didn't want to store a whole session in a cookie, it seemed kind of complex to me. Can you think of a quick way to get this information? A: The problem is that if the client uses the same browser to login and show the name, he will be logged in both times. As for my solution, I'm using a check on the database to get the name of the logged-in user. I'm using SQL Server for this. This database will be used for the persistence of the login and name of the logged-in user. Once the user is logged in, it checks if the next request comes from the same client, so it doesn't require any database, server or even time.
