Full Text Available External barriers may affect access to health care and are, therefore, important in several areas of health care. This study uses data from a national survey and 2006-2016 Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP) to examine the changes in access to health care and the potential health outcomes due to access barriers among SNAP recipients in the United States. Findings show an initial increase in access to health care that subsequently faded over the sample period, with about 26% of the sample of SNAP recipients being limited in their access to health care between 2008 and 2015. Over the same time period, general health indicators improved as measured by decreased weight-based anemia, increased BMI, and increased consumption of fruits and vegetables. SNAP recipients with access barriers to health care experienced poorer nutrition status relative to SNAP recipients without access barriers. Among SNAP recipients, general health improved over the study period and the gap in nutrition status between SNAP recipients with access to health care and SNAP recipients without access narrowed.

The objective of this study was to examine the information flow about the E-Verify system in the United States to determine the extent of awareness among U.S. employers and the public. Using a list of organizations identified by the U.S. Department of Homeland Security (DHS) as participating in the E-Verify program, we analyzed the availability of the program's web site and press releases, phone numbers, and e-mail addresses. Our assessment was limited to organizations' websites, newspaper articles, and press releases released in English during the period from January 1, 2014 to May 31, 2015. The number and content of web pages for the E-Verify program provided by the DHS's Office of Citizenship and Migration Statistics were also analyzed.

Overall, we found that the E-Verify program is being well publicized and, in some cases, almost universally discussed, even by nongovernmental organizations outside the mainstream media. The program's operational procedures and the eligibility process for work authorization were among the areas for improvement identified by employers, and the DHS should ensure that more accurate information is disseminated. Traffic collision safety has become a public safety issue with the increase in the number of automobile traffic. The analysis of traffic crash has been conducted by using the first-person point of view. The object of this study is to investigate the effectiveness of the
